Notes on

Les Biches

The title “les biches” – meaning “the darlings” and “the hinds” – appropriately describes the complexities of Bronislava Nijinska’s chic and flirtatious satire of the 1920s French flapper scene. Diaghilev offered the great 20th century composer Francis Poulenc his first large-scale commission, in which he was to create a score for an atmospheric ballet, one which would emphasize mood rather than narrative. Thus the ballet, set at an afternoon party in a quintessential glamorous French beach house, was described by Poulenc as one “which you may see nothing at all or into which you may read the worst.” It was an “ambiguous blend of innocence and corruption” which created an “atmosphere of wantonness” that was familiar to many French viewers. The stylized reflection of real life which emphasized subtext, innuendo and personal audience interpretation had never before been seen on the ballet stage. Furthermore, the featuring of provocative female characters and a collaboration with female costume and set designer Marie Laurencin made many regard Les Biches as one of the first feminist ballets.

Afternoon of a Faun / Afternoon of the Faunes

In 1912 Vaslav Nijinsky premiered his first choreographic endeavor with the Ballets Russes. Afternoon of a Faun was a provocative, revolutionary work which marked the true beginnings of modernism in dance. In his search to create a truly unique and new form of movement, Nijinsky drew upon his costume and set designer Leon Bakst's love of Greece to invent a type of dance which resembled a moving frieze based on Greek and Egyptian reliefs and vase paintings. The combination of its sexually explicit themes and its shocking new movement quality sparked an uproar among French dance critics as well as audiences of the time.

Having been inspired by several Diaghilev ballets from the early 20th century, Mark Dendy pays homage to Nijinsky's ballet with Afternoon of the Faunes. Expounding on the odd, eccentric animal movement of Nijinsky, Dendy has recreated the ballet for two men. He explores both the subject and object relationship as well as the ego and the id of the faun. The duet walks the tightrope between the madness and genius that was the tragedy of Nijinsky's life.

Afternoon of the Faunes (from Dream Analysis)

Choreography by Mark Dendy

Music by Claude Debussy

Costumes by Liz Prince

Lighting by David Ferri

Premiere:

July 14, 1996

American Dance Festival

Durham, NC

Afternoon of the Faunes was inspired by a section of Nijinsky's diary. Expounding on Nijinsky's odd, eccentric animal movement, Dendy recreates the ballet for two men.

"I run instead of walking. I run a lot because I feel strong. I have obedient muscles. I have an obedient brain. I dance more easily, and I have a big appetite. I ran and ran down the hill on which our house was standing. I ran and ran. I did not stumble. A mysterious force was driving me forward."

Four Bagatelles

Music by Ludwig van Beethoven
Choreography by Jerome Robbins
Costumes by Florence Klotz
Lighting by Ronald Bates

Premiere:
January 10, 1974
New York State Theater

Jerome Robbins' Four Bagatelles, initially created for a gala in May 1973, is set to a selection from Beethoven's bagatelles, or short piano pieces, which he published in three sets. Three of Robbins' choices are from Seven Bagatelles (Op. 33, Nos. 4, 5, and 2, in order of performance), the first set to be published, which included very early compositions. The fourth piece in the ballet is from Six Bagatelles (Op. 126, No. 4), which were among the composer's final works. Beethoven's bagatelles were extremely concise, but the best of them amply show the composer's ability to build complexity of structure and emotional texture. Robbins' Four Bagatelles, originally performed by Violette Verdy and Jean-Pierre Bonnefoux, uses the piano pieces to showcase spacious movement and quicksilver footwork within the traditional structure of a pas de deux.
